Dear Editor:

In your "Notes from the Editor" column in the March 2001, you included an afterthought about a picture in Esquire magazine. I really don't think that is appropriate for a publication such as Modern Steel Construction and I would venture that all other female engineers would agree with me. I am extremely disappointed that a picture of a half-dressed woman was included in your column. It would have been more palatable had you omitted the picture. In fact, even the men in my office agreed that was in poor taste.

People wonder why there aren't more women in structural engineering, but with sexism like this, it should be obvious.
